

Page 80, Exercise 4

Question 1

I think it would be hard for me to do lots of hard, physical work. In our modern world, we can buy all those things like food or clothes, but if you have to grow or hunt your own food or dye your own clothes, it will be very hard for me and my muscles will be aching. But I think you can get used to it.

The lack of electricity and modern technology would be much harder for me, I think. This Friday, we have had a power outage in Aichach for a bit more than an hour, and it was hard to find something you could do without needing electricity at all (even our cordless telephone stopped working, but fortunately our mobile phones still worked). Being in contact with "chat friends" from all over the world that share the same interests would not be possible either then (carrier pigeons do not count, if they have already been invented). But, on the other hand, maybe in Iron Age everybody had the same interests (finding something they can eat and not getting ill) anyway.

When living in the real Iron Age, getting ill would be a larger problem for me as well since people often died from a flu or from metal poisoning, especially from the copper in bronze. But when taking part at a similar experiment I would just quit it when I see real threats to my life.

Question 2

The first thing I would most likely do is get at some place with Internet access and check for e-mails. Of course, I would not be able to read all those E-mails at once, but I would skim through the subject lines whether some information sounds interesting to me or someone I did not hear from for ages tried to contact me (maybe even because he saw me in television) so that I can answer him.